We are tracking tensions along the French-Belgian border over a rock.

A Belgian farmer has ignited a mild diplomatic stand off by moving his country a few meters into French territory.

The farmer thought this stone was a nuisance, so he moved it.

The stone was laid down in 1819.

It became part of a treaty establishing where the border lies.

Officials from both countries say this can be worked out peacefully and the border will be put back where it belongs.
